Partnership in Action

Like most parents in 2020, Belkis Moya suddenly became the “principal” of her home when her children started virtual schooling in response to the coronavirus pandemic. She worried how the challenges of the pandemic would impact her children’s ability to learn and achieve ... and how she would be able to support them along the way.

"I'm not a teacher and English isn't my first language, but lessons and homework are in English," said Belkis. But Belkis knew she had a unique support system behind her with the Community Partnership Schools™ model. Mort, Elementary, A Community Partnership School provides support to students and their families both inside and outside of the classroom.

Belkis’ daughter, Brithany, is a student at Mort and participates in the school’s after-school program to help her keep up with her classes and find new opportunities for enrichment. “With Mort’s extra activities my daughter gets help with her math, writing and reading,” said Belkis.

“She also does virtual Yoga classes and takes elective Spanish classes to help with her fluency in the language. It’s helpful, but it’s also so much more than tutoring – the after-school activities provide an outlet for my daughter to be social, laugh and have fun. Even though we’re at home all day, she has an outlet and she is happy.”
