Partnership in Action

For Christy's son Aden, the behavior issues started in kindergarten. "He would throw tables, chairs, knock stuff off the desk. He was out of control," she said. The behavior continued into the first grade, where he was suspended and removed several times from the school bus. Aden's teacher worked with school leaders to put him on an Individualized Education Program plan (IEP) to address his unique barriers to learning.

Through the Community Partnership School™ model, Aden started seeing a CHS counselor, and he was matched with a mentor. Aden now uses the coping skills he learned in counseling to calm himself down and ask the teacher if he can take a time out. Aden is now in the 3rd grade at The Webster School, he almost made A/B Honor Roll this year, and his teacher thinks Aden no longer needs an IEP to succeed in the classroom.

"We would have been pretty defeated," said Christy. "It took a team of people to come in and sit down with him and make him see, aside from his mom, that people care."
